THE INFLUENCE OF PARTY UPON LEGISLATION IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

By Prof. A. LAWRENCE LOWELL.

The extraordinary development and permanence of political parties in every large democratic country has of late years attracted universal attention; and in America the growing sense of the importance of party in public life has been shown not only in the discussions of observers and reformers, but also by the laws now enacted in almost every State in the Union to regulate the party machinery. Political organizations have emerged from the twilight of private collections of men whose proceedings concern no one else, into the strong glare that falls on associations of a public character whose action affects the entire community. And yet we are singularly ignorant of the real influence which party exerts upon public affairs. > We hear much general denunciation of its action, much talk of party dictation, and recently some political theories have been based upon the assumption that political action in America is almost entirely determined by the party machines. [But a careful observation of current politics seems to show that the vehemence in the outcry against party and in the complaint of its despotism by no means always corresponds with the actual extent of its power.

It seems useful, therefore, to examine carefully the control of party over the work of legislative bodies; for this is at the same time one of the most vital fields of political activity, and one in which it is difficult to form an accurate estimate of the extent of party influence without thorough statistics. With that object in view, a study has been made of the English Parliament, the Congress of the United States, and several State legislatures; the number of members of each party who voted for or against every question in the course of a session being tabulated wherever the names are recorded; that is, whenever a division, or a vote by yeas and nays, took place.

In the case of Parliament, normal sessions of the House of Commons have been selected at intervals of about ten years since 1836—the year when the division lists were first printed—so that the tables show both the amount of party voting at any one moment, and the tendency to change with the course of time. In America, where a general law of change does not appear so clearly, the examination has been less extensive historically, and is more nearly confined to existing conditions.^a

As the labor required to compile these statistics is very great, it seemed worth while to print, not only a general summary of the results, but also the materials on which those results are based, in order that anyone interested in the subject may be enabled to use them in connection with an investigation of his own. With the exception of a few sessions, therefore, which have been omitted because they do not throw any additional light on the problem, the tables at the end of this paper contain, for each of the sessions examined, a list of all the divisions, or yea-and-nay votes, not unanimous, with a brief statement of the question voted upon and the number of members of each of the principal parties who voted yes and no.^b In attempting to condense into a single line an abstract of the question at issue it is often impossible to present its full significance, or to explain the exact state of the parliamentary procedure under which it arose, but it is hoped that enough has been given to make the nature of the subject-matter involved clear, and a marginal reference to the number of the division in England,^c or to the page of the legislative journal in America, will make it possible to identify readily the vote if necessary. From these lists unanimous votes are omitted, because to insert them seemed unnecessary, and, in fact, they occur only in consequence of a peculiar procedure. No one would, of course, care to insist upon a call of the roll when there was no opposition; and hence the names of the persons voting in such cases would not be recorded were it not that in a number of States the constitution requires a yea-and-nay vote on the final passage of every bill. Under these circumstances the quantity of unanimous votes is sometimes prodigious. In the senate of New York, for example, there were in the session of 1899 1,235 yea-and-nay votes, of which 961 were unanimous. Except for the provision in the constitution there would have been no roll call on these votes, and to include them in our list would merely swell the tables inordinately, without any corresponding advantage.

^aThe statistics for several sessions of Congress and for the New York legislature were worked out for the writer more fully than they can be presented here, by Mr. J. B. Studley, of the Harvard Law School, whose systematic method of attacking the subject has been an invaluable assistance.

^bOnly the members actually voting are counted. Pairs are left out of account, and so, in accordance with the usual English practice, are the tellers in the House of Commons.

^cThe numbers set against the divisions in the table for 1836 are those of the writer. The official lists of divisions were not numbered at that time.

In the tables some abbreviations have been used, but these, such as "adj." for adjourn, "2 R." and "3 R." for second and third reading, or "6 mos." for a motion that the bill be read this day six months, will be obvious to anyone familiar with parliamentary procedure. The only symbol that might not be readily understood is that of "(vs)" in the House of Commons. A motion there is often put, not in the form in which it is made, but reversed. Thus, if a motion is made to amend a bill by omitting certain words in order to substitute others, the question is often put in the form "that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the bill." This putting of a question backward is very common in the case of many kinds of motions, and the (vs) is inserted to show that it has been done.

The tables for the different sessions are followed by an appendix giving summaries of the results in a comparative form, and in preparing these it has been found convenient to use symbols to denote the extent of party voting. A party vote of any party is arbitrarily defined as one in which more than nine-tenths of those of its members who voted were on the same side of the question; a non-party vote as one in which one-tenth or more of the members are found on each side—that is, a vote where at least one-tenth of the voting members of the party split off from the rest. A party vote is indicated in the table by an asterisk, a nonparty vote by a dagger. For every division or vote the attitude of the two leading parties, and only those two, is taken into account, and hence there are for every vote two marks, one for each of the two chief parties. In England the first mark always refers to the vote of the Conservatives, the second mark to that of the Liberals,^a while for America the first mark indicates the Republican^b and the second the Democratic vote. Thus, the symbol *†, for example, means that the Republicans cast a party vote on the question at issue and that the Democrats did not. The actions of any smaller political groups, though included in the tables, are omitted from the summaries because in Anglo-Saxon countries, where there are almost always two main parties, the small groups have little effect upon the question of the control of legislation by party, and the attempt to include them in the summary would either produce a false impression or make the symbols extremely complicated.

It sometimes happens that both parties vote on the same side. Clearly such a case ought to be distinguished from those where they vote upon opposite sides, and hence wherever either party casts a party vote upon the same side of a question as the majority of the other party the two marks are inclosed in brackets. To use the illustration already given, the symbol (*†) shows that the Republicans cast a party vote, while the Democrats did not, but that the majority of both parties voted the same way.

In order to bring the results into a tabular form for the purpose of comparison, the final summary gives in four columns, for the several sessions of the bodies examined, the number of occasions (1) where there were party votes of both parties on opposite sides, that is, true party votes, indicated thus * *; (2) the occasions where one party cast a party vote and the other party did not, but where the majorities of the two parties were opposed, and these include, of course, both † and †; (3) the cases where this happened, but the majorities of the two parties were on the same side, that is, (†) and (†), and (4) the number of instances, marked thus ††, where neither party cast a party vote. Each of the columns is followed by another giving the percentage, an arrangement which shows at a glance the comparative extent of party voting in the different bodies examined.

From this final summary there have been omitted not only the unanimous votes, but those which were nearly unanimous—that is, where more than nine-tenths of both parties voted on the same side. Such votes occur, either where a third party, like the Home Rulers in England, is forcing divisions resisted by both of the main sections of the House,^a or where, as in some of the State legislatures, a yea-and-nay vote is required on the passage of every bill; and in neither case can the number of such votes be fairly taken into account in estimating the comparative amount of party voting in the body.

The results of the summaries are further displayed graphically in charts, the lengths of whose columns show for every session the percentage of each of the four classes of votes. The proportion of cases where both parties cast party votes is indicated by the black column at one end, the non-party votes by the shaded column at the other, while the mixed votes are shown by the two columns that lie between, the cases where the party vote of one party and the majority of the other were on opposite sides appearing in a column alternately shaded and black, and the cases where they were on the same side being portrayed by narrow black and shaded columns side by side. The columns are so drawn that one per cent of the total number of divisions in the session^a is represented by a sixteenth of an inch, the combined length of all four columns being always six and two-thirds inches. By looking, therefore, at the relative amounts of black and shaded surface one can readily compare at sight the proportion of party votes in different legislative bodies, or in the same body at different times.^b

ENGLAND.⁷

In choosing sessions of the English Parliament for examination, an effort has been made to avoid, as far as possible, those in which a change of ministry occurred, or which were for any other reason abnormal. The ones selected were 1836, 1850, 1860, 1871, 1881, 1894, and 1899.^c

^a Excluding, as already stated, unanimous and nearly unanimous votes.

^b A careful observer may note slight discrepancies between the charts and the summary. These are due to corrections made in the summary after the charts were photographed. None of the changes, however, were of sufficient size to make it worth while to draft the charts afresh.

^c Years in which a change of ministry or a dissolution took place or a great war was raging have been avoided.

For 1836, 1850, 1860, 1871, and 1894, the printed division lists were used, but for the other two years, 1881 and 1899, these were not to be had at the time the tables were made up. For 1881 the figures are taken from the Parliamentary Buff Book, compiled in that year from the division lists by Mr. T. N. Roberts. For 1899 the lists of divisions were taken from Hansard, which has recently begun to print them again. Unfortunately, it has been impossible to procure absolutely complete lists for any of these years except 1881 and 1894. For each of the other years one or more divisions are omitted from the collection of lists, and these are noted in the following tables. But as the number of divisions omitted does not exceed seven in any year, the possible error is very small, so small as to be hardly perceptible in the percentage of results.

It has not always been easy to classify all the members of Parliament under their respective parties, especially on account of the habit that prevailed with a number of public men, during the middle portion of the century, of styling themselves officially Liberal-Conservatives. Of these men, some had really become Liberals and some Conservatives; but the task of classifying them is rendered less difficult by the curious psychological fact that most of them, though disliking to call themselves by a party name, were unusually constant in going into the lobby with the party whip. A more serious difficulty arises in dealing with certain semidetached groups of members. Ought the Radicals or Home Rulers, for example, to be classed at a particular time as Liberals or not? It is evident that this will affect the result materially, for as they did not vote with the Liberal whips as steadily as the other members of the party, to exclude them increases the apparent amount of party voting, and to include them diminishes it. In deciding this matter the writer has been guided by the prevailing attitude of the group during the session in question. The Radicals have, in fact, been classed throughout as Liberals, for although they appear in the table of votes for 1850 in a distinct column, their votes have been added to those of the Liberals in computing the party votes and in compiling the summary of results. The Home Rulers, on the other hand, have been classed as a separate party in 1850, 1881, and 1899, while in 1894 both sections of the Nationalists are treated as members of the Liberal party.^a In the other sessions considered the Irish members do not appear as a distinct group. On the other side of the House the Peelites are excluded in 1850, but the Conservatives and Liberal Unionists are counted together as one party in 1894 and 1899.^b

A glance at the summary of results shows a great change in the amount of party voting in the House of Commons from 1836 to the end of the century; a change, moreover, that is progressive, not spasmodic, and therefore due not to accidental but to permanent causes. In 1836 the proportion of divisions where both parties cast party votes on opposite sides is ^a It makes, in fact, no difference in the results whether the small body of Parnellites is counted in 1894 with the Liberals or not.

^b In America the question is less important, because in the sessions selected the third parties have been small. The manner in which they have been treated is noted in the summary of results.

22.65 per cent. This diminishes in 1850 to 15.89 per cent, and in 1860 to 6.22 per cent. It then rises, in 1871, to 35.16 per cent, in 1881 to 46.73 per cent, and in 1894 reaches 76.03 per cent, falling a trifle in 1899, to 68.95 per cent. This last fall, by the way, is largely counterbalanced by the great increase in 1899 over 1894 in the divisions where a party vote was cast by one party and the majorities of the two parties were on opposite sides, and the corresponding decrease in the cases where the majorities of the two parties were on the same side. The column of divisions where neither side of the House cast a party vote tells the same story. The proportion of these divisions in 1836 was 25.97 per cent. It increased until 1860, when it was 50.19 per cent, and then diminished every ten years until in 1894 it was only 4.13 per cent, and finally almost vanished in 1899, with 2.28 per cent.

It would appear, therefore, that the amount of party voting in the House of Commons diminished until about the middle of the century, and since that time has increased steadily. The figures place the lowest point in 1860, but it would probably be more correct to place it earlier, for this is a case where the attempt to group the members into parties is misleading. In the table for 1860 all the members of the House are classed as Conservatives or Liberals, whereas in 1850 they are classed as Protectionists, Peelites, Liberals, and Repealers, and in computing the amount of party voting, only the Protectionists and Liberals, as the two principal parties, are taken into account. The fact is that in 1850 the House was so broken into independent groups that it is impossible to divide it, as in 1860, into supporters and opponents of the Government. The disintegration of parties was, indeed, greater in the years that followed the repeal of the corn laws, and the fall of Sir Robert Peel, in 1846, than at any other period since the reform bill of 1832, and hence it is at this time that taking, not the two chief parties alone, but the House as a whole, party voting was really at its lowest point.

The change in the amount of party voting, indicating as it does the strength of party cohesion, and the extent of control of the leaders over their followers, finds its expression also in the rise and fall of the number of defeats for the Government in the different sessions of Parliament. Such defeats can easily be recognized in the lists of divisions in the tables below, because for each division where the Government whips were tellers, an "aye" or "no" in the first column of the table shows the side on which they acted. It will be observed, therefore, that in 1836 the Government suffered only one defeat, in 1850 they suffered twelve, in 1860 seven, in 1871 nine, in 1881 three, in 1894 one, and in 1899 none.

The number of defeats in any particular session is, of course, largely a matter of accident, and is, moreover, liable to be swelled to an inordinate amount when, as in 1868, a ministry is struggling for existence without a majority in the House. Still, in the long run, it varies inversely with the strength of the hold that the treasury bench has over its party, and the last table at the end of this paper, giving the total number of Government defeats in the House of Commons in each session since 1847, certainly shows, though with some fluctuations, that they have tended to diminish steadily from the middle to the end of the century. The jagged line in the chart for the House of Commons, and still better the special chart which follows it, show this result graphically, the line being for each year as many eighths of an inch above the base of the chart as there were defeats for the Government during the session.

Another piece of evidence that leads to the same conclusion is to be found in the extent to which the members of the party in power vote against their own ministers. A statement of the number of times a majority of the party in power went into the lobby against the Government whips is inserted at the end of the table of divisions for each session, and it will be seen that in 1836 this happened four times; in 1850 twelve times; in 1860 three times, while on three more occasions the party was evenly divided. In 1871 it occurred eight times; in 1881 twice; in 1894 twice, if the Home Rulers are not counted in the ranks of the Liberals, and five times if they are included, and finally, in 1899, when the Conservatives were in power, not only did it not happen at all, but never did so much as one-fifth of the Unionists who took part in the division vote against the Government. During the middle period of the century it was not uncommon for a cabinet to be saved from defeat at the hands of its own followers by the help of its opponents. Now such occurrences have become rare.

Nor is this due to the fact that cabinets, for fear of defeat, have grown cautious and leave questions open more than formerly. On the contrary, with the decay of legislation by private members' bills, the proportion of divisions in which the Government whips are tellers has increased. In 1836 it was less than one-half, but in the sessions of 1894 and 1899 it was not far from nine-tenths; and that this progress, though somewhat irregular if taken from year to year, has been on the whole continuous is made evident by comparing a series of sessions together. Taking the ten years from 1851 to 1860, inclusive, the Government whips were tellers in 69.91 per cent of the divisions, and in the years 1878 to 1887 in 81.81 per cent.

The tendency toward greater party cohesion in England is not confined to any one party, for although the Liberals have always been more independent than the Conservatives, and less willing to follow implicitly the guidance of their chiefs, yet the change of which we are speaking has not been less marked in their case. > Their proportion of party votes, while always smaller than that of the Conservatives, has borne to it a ratio not very far from constant. If we take those proportions, calculated for the years under consideration upon the basis already explained, they may be summarized as follows:

Year.	Number of divisions.	Conservatives.				Liberals.
		*	%	†	%	*	%	†	%
1836.....	181	102	56	79	44	73	40	108	60
1850.....	321	145	45	176	55	118	37	203	63
1860.....	257	79	31	178	69	65	25	192	75
1871.....	256	156	61	100	39	142	55	114	45
1881.....	199	142	71	57	29	132	66	67	34
1894.....	242	221	91	21	9	195	81	47	19
1899.....	351	319	91	32	9	266	76	85	24

The falling off in the percentage of party votes among the Liberals in 1899 was due, of course, to their being in opposition instead of being in power, and the fact that the party votes of the Conservatives did not show a corresponding increase after they took office is no doubt to be accounted for by their enormous majority, which has been a continual stumbling block in the way of party discipline.

A political change of so marked a character as this, extending over many years, has not been accidental, and its causes are to be sought, partly in the special conditions of English history during the period, and partly in the normal development of the parliamentary system.

The feelings aroused by the agitation for the reform bill of 1832 kept party spirit in a state of activity for some years. Party lines at that time were not, indeed, so clearly drawn, and the members of a party were not so united, as at the present day. The Whigs and Radicals were not a homogeneous body, and the Whig ministers were often sustained in resisting the demands of their Radical supporters by the help of Tory votes. Still the reform bill had brought a new meaning into politics, and the Conservative reaction that followed the first successes of the Liberals seemed destined to result in two fairly well balanced parties confronting each other permanently and alternating in power. But this condition of things did not last long. Neither parties nor opinions were thoroughly consolidated. Events were moving too fast for that; and the repeal of the corn laws was followed not only by a split in the Conservative ranks which never healed, but also by a general loss of party cohesion. This was the time when Lord Palmerston, having been forced out of the ministry for expressing, on his own authority, approval of the coup d'état in France, had his "tit for tat with John Russell," as he said, and "turned him out" on the militia bill within two months. For some years Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell, like the leaders in a continental parliamentary government, were alternately turning one another out, and sitting as colleagues in the same cabinet. During the fifties three different ministries were driven from power by the desertion of a part of their Liberal followers. The parties were, in fact, in a state of confusion. The Liberals depended for a working majority, and hence for their tenure of office, upon the sufferance of the Peelites; but although these two groups long maintained a separate existence they hardly differed in opinions from one another more than they did among themselves; and since they had together an assured majority in Parliament it was possible for their members, and especially for the Whigs who stood midway between the Peelites and the Radicals, to indulge in domestic differences without permanent danger to their principles or their supremacy.

As it takes two to make a quarrel, so no party can be maintained in fighting discipline unless it has another party to fight with, strong enough to be a serious menace to its tenure of power. This the Liberal party did not have for more than a score of years after Peel's downfall in 1846. During the earlier part of that period one-half of the former Conservative party was friendly, while the other half was impotent; and the same conditions that made strongly concerted action unnecessary for the Liberals made it useless for their opponents. In the course of Lord Palmerston's second administration the Peelites disappeared as a separate body—being absorbed for the most part into the ranks of the Liberals. The death of that statesman in 1865 removed the great obstacle to reform, while the election of 1868 placed so large a majority in Mr. Gladstone's hands that he could afford to neglect small numbers of dissentients in his own party. Then came the golden age of Liberalism, when its principles could be worked out without too much regard to the exigencies of party warfare; and it did not pass away until Disraeli had built up a formidable Tory party—a process that was not entirely complete for some years after the reform bill of 1868 had brought a new element into the electorate. Until 1874 the Conservatives never obtained a majority in Parliament. They came into office, indeed, on three occasions, but only as stop gaps while the majority were adjusting their differences and drawing together for a fresh control of the Government. After the extension of the franchise in 1868, however, the real alternation in power of the two great parties began, and except for the election of 1900, which was held during the stress of war, there has been for the last thirty years a very near approximation to a regular swing of the political pendulum at each successive election. Under such conditions the necessity for cohesion has become an ever-present motive for party discipline.

That the Liberal split over the first home-rule bill did not, like the quarrel among the Conservatives after the repeal of the corn laws, result in a general weakening of party ties may be attributed partly to the fact that the measure having failed, the question remained unsettled; partly to the democratic nature of the electorate, which increased the influence of party as a political force; and partly to a factor which must now be considered—the normal development of the parliamentary system.

Government by a responsible ministry, where it has grown up spontaneously as in England, is essentially the product of party rivalry. It was not the inevitable consequence of the long struggle between the House of Commons and the Crown, for some other device might very well have been found for bringing the executive power under the control of Parliament. It was rather the result of the condition of the House itself, for it is not conceivable that this form of government should have appeared had Parliament never been divided into Whigs and Tories. Each step in the growth of the system has been the result of a strife between the two factions of which the House was at the moment composed, and in fact the whole plan would be meaningless if parties did not exist. The reason for the resignation of a ministry upon the rejection of a measure it has proposed is that the defeat indicates a general loss of confidence in the policy of the party in power and a preference for another body of leaders with a different policy. If this were not so the Swiss system of remaining in office, but yielding on the point at issue, would be far more reasonable.

The parliamentary system is therefore the natural outgrowth and a rational expression of the division of the ruling chamber into two parties. But, like every rational form of government, it reacts upon and strengthens the conditions of its own existence. It is based upon party, and, from the law of its nature, tends to accentuate party. When men recognize that the defeat of a government measure means a change of ministry, the pressure is strong to sacrifice personal opinions on the measure in question to the more important general principles for which the party stands; and the more fully the system develops, the more clear is the incompatibility between voting as the member of Parliament pleases on individual measures and maintaining in power the party he approves.^a

Moreover, since the ministry may be overturned at any moment, its life depends upon an unintermittent warfare, and it must strive to keep its followers constantly in hand; and since every defeat, however trivial, even if not fatal, is damaging, it must try to prevent any hostile votes, an effort which explains in part the much larger average attendance at divisions to-day than formerly. It follows that the tendency of the Parliamentary system in its development is towards more and more strict party voting.

This tendency has been increased by the wide extension of the franchise by the reform bills of 1868 and 1885. In a small and highly educated electorate, and still more within the walls of a legislative chamber, it is possible to perceive the finer shades of politics, to appreciate the value of compromise, and even to bear with temporary coalitions; and hence party lines may be somewhat vague. But a democracy understands only broad alternatives, clearly marked issues and the frank opposition of party leaders. It has a better comprehension of the struggle between the two front benches than of the bearing of the measures debated. Unless some matter of local interest is involved—and this the English practice, and especially the admirable system of private bill legislation, eliminates almost altogether—a democracy is prone to support the party, with comparatively little regard for matters of detail.

A high degree of party voting appears, therefore, to be a natural consequence of the parliamentary system, and may be expected to continue in normal times so long as that system retains its character. If it should ever happen that the authority of the Cabinet on the one side, and of the electorate on the other, became predominant, and Parliament lost much of its importance, a general election might be nearly equivalent to the periodic choice of a commission of government. If so, the fiction an entire agreement on all public questions might not be necessary, and the leaders of a party might, perhaps, be more free to express their individual differences of opinion, but in that case parliamentary government would have lost its character.

All this does not mean that the majority can do whatever it pleases without regard to the wishes of the minority. To some extent that is the case; but it would be a great mistake to suppose that the parliamentary system in England was developing into party tyranny. There is another side to the shield, for the very fact that the Government must avoid defeats often makes it cautious, if not timid. It can not disregard the opinions of the minority, because they are in most cases shared by a part of its own followers, and the vote of a small fraction of its own supporters added to that of the opposition may be enough to involve defeat. The same forces that lead a member of the party to sacrifice his personal opinions to party necessity lead the cabinet to modify their policy in deference to the protests of a few supporters. If, therefore, the parliamentary system can be said to involve party despotism, it is a despotism tempered by many powerful forces both within and without the dominant party.

One cannot leave this subject without attempting to explain the opinion, which is certainly common among members of Parliament, that party lines are not more strictly drawn than they were formerly. It is often said that there is as much independent voting as ever. That such an opinion is erroneous is proved by the figures, but that it should be held is significant. The truth is that the degree to which a man is sensible of party constraint, the extent to which he complains of party tyranny, or conversely of laxity of party discipline, depends not upon the amount of authority actually exerted, but upon the relation which it bears to the amount he thinks ought to be exerted. It is curious that in 1894, when party voting was carried much farther than it had been formerly, the periodicals were full of laments over the breaking up of the House of Commons into groups, and of gloomy forebodings of a breakdown of parliamentary government on account of the impossibility of maintaining party cohesion. Nor were these views entirely unwarranted. The parliamentary system in its present form requires a party discipline far more strict than it did a generation ago, and perhaps more strict than it will always be possible to maintain. A man may be as unconscious of the pressure of party as he is of that of the atmosphere, if it is natural, constant, and evenly distributed, and this is very much the case in England. The belief that private members of Parliament are as independent as ever is no doubt based in part upon the fact that in former times debate was left mainly to the ministers and a few of their most active opponents, the country squire, who had the privilege of writing M. P. after his name, speaking rarely, and fulfilling his duties by walking through the lobby on important divisions. Now most members are anxious to have their constituents look upon them as active at Westminster, and hence the number of men who take part in debate has increased very much, while every man who rises to his feet seeks to make it appear that he is expressing his own personal opinions. The result is one that perplexes the stranger in the gallery. He hears so many men on both sides of the House speak freely of the merits and faults of a measure, urge amendments, and criticise the attitude of the ministry, that he begins to think that the result of the division is really doubtful; but when the tellers bring in their report he finds that the Government has obtained the usual majority." Curiously enough, the very fact that private members take a larger part in debate has helped, by consuming the time of Parliament, to diminish the opportunity of passing private members' bills, and, in short, of passing any bills without party pressure. It has thus tended to increase the proportion of divisions in which the Government whips are tellers and the votes are cast on party lines.

AMERICA. ⁷

The legislative bodies in the United States present a different array of figures and a different set of problems.^b

Five Congresses have been selected for examination. First, the Twenty-ninth Congress, elected in 1844, when the Whig and Democratic parties were in full activity. This may be regarded as a normal antebellum Congress. The President (Polk) was a Democrat, and the same party had a good working majority in each House. Ten years later the Whig party had begun to go pieces under the pressure of the slavery question, and hence the next Congress taken is the Thirty-eighth, elected in 1862, during the heat of the war, with a Republican majority in both branches, and Lincoln as President. The third is the Fiftieth Congress, elected in 1886, with a Democrat in the White House, a slight Republican ^aIt may be argued that the amount of party voting appears greater than it really is, because a member who does not like a party measure will often abstain from voting altogether, although he may hesitate to vote against it. But a man who from party motives abstains from the vote he would otherwise cast is yielding a half obedience to his party; so that even in such cases the recorded votes furnish an indication, though not an exact numerical measure, of the control of party over the votes of its members.

^bThe statistics of votes in America are taken in all cases from the yea and nay votes in the journals. Unanimous votes are omitted, and as has already been observed, these are exceedingly numerous in many of the State legislatures, owing to the common constitutional provision requiring a yea and nay vote on the passage of every bill. Even when a bill has been opposed at some stage its final passage is often unanimous; but this is, of course, very unlikely to occur where the bill has been opposed on party lines. Votes which are invalid for lack of a quorum—that is, votes without a quorum other than on motions to adjourn and for a call of the House—are also omitted from the tables.

majority in the Senate, and a slight Democratic one in the House. Then the Fifty-fifth, chosen in 1896, when the Republicans controlled the Executive and both Houses; and, finally, the Fifty-sixth, which has been taken because the amount of party voting varied so widely in the different sessions of the preceding Congress as to make the results appear abnormal. Of these Congresses the detailed list of votes in the Thirty-eighth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-sixth are alone printed in the tables, but the summaries that follow include the results for all the five Congresses, the percentage of the different classes of votes being given for each session, as well as for the Congress as a whole.

A comparison of the figures for these different dates makes it clear that any general tendency that may exist toward a change in the amount of party voting does not work by any means so steadily as in England. (The amount of party voting varies very much from one Congress, and even from one session, to another, and does not follow closely any fixed law of evolution. It is, indeed, much less in the Twenty-ninth Congress than in the Fifty-sixth, and, no doubt, it tends on the whole to increase; yet with the great fluctuations that have taken place, sometimes between two sessions of the same Congress, one must be cautious in drawing conclusions. (It has happened in about half of these Congresses that the proportion of party votes has been nearly twice as large in one session as in another.) The most striking instance occurs in the Fifty-fifth Congress. Here the percentage of cases where both sides cast party votes was in the first session of the House 85.71 per cent, and in the third session only 20.00 per cent; while in the Senate it was 69.47 per cent in the first session and in the third it disappeared altogether. Wherever this happens, and in fact whenever the amount of party voting is peculiarly large, it is because of some one particular measure on which the parties are sharply divided. In the Fifty-fifth Congress it was due to the Dingley tariff bill, which the Houses had been called together in a special session to consider. In the same way the 66.48 per cent of party votes in the Senate in the second session of the Fiftieth Congress was almost entirely due to the Mills tariff bill, or rather to the Senate substitute therefor.

(In Parliament at the present day contentious legislation is in the main conducted by one party and opposed by the other,⁷ and hence the amount of party voting is nearly constant. In Congress this is by no means so true, and the amount of party voting depends largely upon the accident of some question on which the parties are sharply divided happening to come up for decision. On other matters party lines are less strictly drawn. In short, in England the parties frame the issues. In America the issues do not, indeed, make the parties, but determine the extent of their opposition to each other in matters of legislation

¶ In general the result of the statistics for Congress shows that whereas during the middle of the century the amount of party voting there was at least as great as in Parliament, and while in particular sessions the English maximum has been exceeded, yet on the average party lines at the present day are decidedly less strictly drawn than in the House of Commons.)

Of the five State legislatures examined, two (those of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania) have large and constant Republican majorities. The other three (New York, Ohio, and Illinois) are controlled sometimes by one party and sometimes by the other, although in the recent sessions studied it so happens that the majorities in all of them were Republican. These five States furnish, therefore, examples of the activity of party in legislation, both where one party is certain of its predominance, and where the struggle for supremacy is acute; and it may be remarked that in no State in the Union would a larger amount of party voting be expected than in the three selected from the second type.

The writer has made no attempt to examine the history of party voting in the State legislatures, and in fact the results seem to show that such an effort would hardly repay the labor involved. It has been enough to discover the existing conditions, and therefore the statistics relate for the most part to the latest legislative session available at the time they were compiled. In the case of New York, however, where the state of things is exceptional, the year 1894 has been taken as well as the year 1899, and the result seems to indicate that while the conditions differ from those in other States they are normal in New York. In Pennsylvania also it was felt that the marked absence of party voting in 1899 might be due to the war then waged against Mr. Quay by a large section of the Republicans, and hence the year 1895 was examined also. The result showed more party voting in the senate and slightly less in the house.

In New York alone among the States considered is the amount of party voting considerable. Here the proportion of party votes is about 25 or 30 per cent in the senate and 45 or 50 per cent in the assembly;^a and there is no very great difference in this respect between the sessions of 1894 and 1899. These figures are so much larger than those of any of the other State legislatures examined as to suggest a difference in kind rather than in degree, and to place the State in a class by itself. Party politics in New York have always run high, and the people have always been divided evenly enough to keep the strife keen. At the same time great size has made more possible than elsewhere a real party division upon State issues instead of upon national ones alone; while the eternal antagonism between the city and the country falls in readily with the existing party lines and furnishes a never-failing source of party votes at Albany.

In the other State legislatures the amount of party voting is much less. In Ohio it is about 15 per cent in the senate and 10 per cent in the house; in Illinois, $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in the senate and $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in the house, the larger figure in the latter being no doubt due in part to the fact that the house is chosen by a system of minority representation, a device which tends naturally to increase the influence of party. In the two remaining States the proportion is smaller still. In Pennsylvania the maximum for either branch of the legislature in the two sessions of 1895 and 1899 was about $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and the minimum was nothing, the average for the two sessions being a little over 3 per cent for the senate and a little over 2 per cent for the house. In Massachusetts the proportion for 1899 was about 1 per cent for the senate and 6 per cent for the house; but this really means a single party vote in the senate and only 3 in the house.

From the point of view, however, of legislation by party even these figures are misleading. Thus, in Ohio, of the 20 party votes in the senate 11 were cast in the election of officers of the body, most of whom, such as clerks and assistant sergeants-at-arms, had no possible connection with public policy. The same may be said of the 5 party votes in the election of members of State boards, trustees of lunatic hospitals, and other State institutions. The men chosen were no doubt intended to see that the employees under their control were of the right political faith, but they were not expected to apply to the lunatics committed to their care a treatment peculiarly Republican. The remaining 4 votes were the only ones directly connected with the enactment of laws, so that the proportion of party votes on questions of legislation was about 3 per cent. The same thing is true of the other branch of the Ohio legislature. Here 11 of the 18 party votes concerned the election of officers of the house, while another was on a resolution of sympathy with the Boers, and thus the proportion of party votes on legislative measures, including the election of the speaker, who is a real political officer, was only about $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

A similar remark may be made in the case of Illinois, although to a much smaller extent; while in Pennsylvania the only party vote in the senate in 1899 was that for the election of a president pro tempore, and of the 7 party votes in the house 4 related to the election of officers of the body and another to a resolution to invite President McKinley to visit the State. Except in New York, therefore, the amount of party voting on legislation proper in the States examined is very small; and this must be at least equally true of all those States—and they form a majority of the whole number—where one of the parties is in a hopeless minority.

In making a comparison of the influence of political parties upon legislation in different public bodies, statistics of the proportion of votes on which party lines are drawn furnish an imperfect test, because the forms of procedure may make a material difference. In the House of Commons, for example, a single member can force a division, whereas in Congress, save in exceptional cases, such as the passage of a bill over the President's veto, the yeas and nays can be ordered only on the demand of one-fifth of the members. Now, it may be assumed that where the parties in Congress are sharply divided on any measure they will call for the yeas and nays in order to place themselves on record; but it is by no means certain that this will be done where the opposition is not on party lines and an oral vote shows a decided majority. It may well happen that non-party votes are found in the division lists of Parliament which would not appear as yea-and-nay votes in the Journals of Congress, and such votes may be sufficiently numerous to produce a substantial effect on the percentage. We should therefore expect, under similar conditions of parties, to find the roll call more nearly confined to party votes at Washington than at Westminster.

Another test of the direct effect of party on legislation, and perhaps a fairer one, is the proportion of bills actually enacted on which there has been a party vote at some stage, and for the purpose of comparison it may be useful to consider first public bills only, reserving for a moment the question of private acts. There are in every legislative body a considerable number of measures that go through by common consent, and the proportion of these, as well as of the bills that are fought, but not on party lines, varies very much. Taking the sessions of Parliament from 1896 to 1900, we find that the number of public bills enacted in a session (including both Government and private members' bills) runs from 53 to 69, while the number of these that had a party vote at some stage of their passage through the House of Commons runs from 11 to 18.^a The total number of these public bills enacted during the five years was 312, and the number of them that had a party vote was 72, or 23.09 per cent. If we turn to the preceding Liberal ministry we reach a period when the political conditions were abnormal. In the year 1894, for example, there was a party vote at some stage in the case of only 4 of the 60 public bills enacted; but it must be remembered that the House of Lords actually rejected one of the Government bills and dropped another. In fact, Lord Rosebery's ministry was not in a position to attempt to carry through contentious legislation. It is impossible, therefore, to obtain statistics on

^a The figures for the different sessions are as follows:

Year.	Public bills enacted.	Party votes.	Per cent.
1896.....	60	13	21.66
1897.....	69	16	23.19
1898.....	66	11	16.66
1899.....	53	18	33.96
1900.....	64	14	21.88
Total.....	312	72	23.09

Although party votes in supply are, of course, frequent, they are not treated in this table as votes on the consolidated-fund bills based upon them. The only party votes on the consolidated-fund and finance bills that are taken into account are those cast directly upon those bills.

this point for a normal period in which the Liberal party was in power without going back to a time when the party system was much less developed than it is now. But there is no reason to suppose that the figures given above would not fairly represent the proportion of laws enacted by party votes under a normal ministry of either party at the present day.

The proportion of public bills enacted on which there was a party vote at some stage of their passage through the House of Representatives at Washington is very much less. For the Thirty-eighth Congress this was true of 18 out of 232 bills, or 7.76 per cent. In the Fiftieth Congress, where the President and the House belonged to one party and the Senate to the other, party legislation was obviously difficult to carry through, and only 1 public bill, out of 154 enacted, had a party vote in the House. Again, in the Fifty-fifth Congress the House cast party votes on 14 out of 195 public bills enacted, or 7.18 per cent. The difference between public bills, on the one hand, and private and local bills, on the other, is, of course, marked in Parliament by a difference of procedure. This is not the case in America, and in making up the statistics for Congress there have been omitted not only all bills that would be treated as private in England, but also all building, bridge, and light-house bills, of which there were a large number, and on which no party votes occurred.

So far as these figures may be taken as a guide it would appear that when the executive and both branches of the legislature are controlled by the same party the proportion of public laws enacted on which there is a party vote at some stage in the House of Commons is about 23 per cent, while in the House of Representatives it is between 7 and 8 per cent; that when the executive and the lower House belong to one party, but the upper House is controlled by the other, and dares to use its power, the proportion in England is about 7 per cent, while under similar conditions in Washington the proportion is less than 1 per cent. The number of sessions examined for this purpose is, of course, far too small to justify any reliance upon the precise figures obtained, but they would seem to make it clear that the proportion of actual public legislation on which there are party votes is much larger in Parliament than in Congress.

The suggestion already made that a difficulty in procuring a yea-and-nay vote may enhance the proportion of party votes does not apply to the legislature of New York, because such a vote is required on the passage of every bill. But an examination of the proportion of public bills enacted there which received a party vote at some stage is instructive. In the session of 1894 there were enacted 309 public measures, and of these only 9, or 2.94 per cent, had a party vote in the assembly at any stage. In the general session of 1899 this was true of 10 out of 328 public bills, or 3.05 per cent. So that while in New York the proportion of party votes appears to be large, the actual influence of party on public legislation is small.

If this is the case in New York [it is evident that in most of the States the proportion of public laws enacted on which there has been a party vote must be almost imperceptible. Moreover, it must be remembered that the greater part of the field of legislation—the laws that govern the ordinary relations of life—fall into the domain of the States, and when this is taken into consideration it is manifest that the total influence of party over legislation in public matters is less by far in America than in England.

Hitherto we have been considering in this connection only public laws. Party divisions on private and local bills, although not unknown in the House of Commons, are rare. There are, no doubt, a few bills affecting London which for a smaller place would be treated as private, but on account of their importance excite general interest, and on these, whether brought in as public or private, the parties are apt to take sides. [It may fairly be said, however, that in England the activity of party is almost entirely confined to public measures. This is by no means so true in the United States.] Purely private bills—that is, measures touching an individual or a corporation—are not, indeed, the subject of many party votes, but, as we have seen in the case of Ohio, a power of election to public office, even where that office involves no real public policy, is freely used in favor of partisans. In regard to local bills the practice varies a great deal. Congress has, of course, little power of this kind, except in the case of local improvements, such as river and harbor bills, and these are not usually fought on party lines, although political influence, as compared with an impartial estimate of public utility, is a most important factor in the distribution of the grants. In New York, the only State where the amount of party voting is considerable, there is quite as much of it on local as on public laws. Of the 338 local bills enacted there in 1894, 10 had party votes in the assembly at some stage, and this was true of 14 out of the 268 enacted in 1899, a proportion somewhat larger, in fact, than in the case of public bills. Of these measures a number relate, of course, to New York City, but there are not a few that deal with other places.

In the remaining States party votes on local matters are uncommon.

We have seen that the proportion of party votes is distinctly less at the present day in Congress than in Parliament, and taking legislation as a whole, State as well as national, the influence of party on public measures is far less in America than in England. This is the more remarkable because democracy, which tends to add to the strength of party, has existed much longer here than in Great Britain. It remains for us to consider, as in the case of England, the cause of the phenomenon, and to explain the general impression that party wields a singularly despotic sway in the United States.

At the period when the Constitution gave to American institutions their definite outward form, the conception of party in its modern shape was unknown. The idea of permanent political organizations struggling for mastery within the state would have shocked the philosophers and statesmen of that day. Like Rousseau, they would have deemed such a state of things incompatible with orderly self-government. They would probably have insisted that one of the parties in a case of that kind must be bent upon revolutionary objects; and in fact the greatest contribution of the nineteenth century to the art of government has been "Her Majesty's Opposition," that is, the existence of a party out of power which is recognized as perfectly loyal to the institutions of the state, and is ready at any moment to come into office without a shock to the political traditions of the country.

The framers of the Constitution did not foresee the rôle that party was to play in popular government, and they made no provision for it in their plan. The people were to pick out the wisest men they could find, and these in turn were to choose the best man in the nation for President and the next best for Vice-President. Congress was also to be composed of men selected for their personal merits, and public questions that arose were to be settled by discussion, mutual concession, and, failing all other means, by majority vote. But no means were provided by which a political party could bring the President and the majorities in the two Houses into accord, and so give effect to its opinions. In England this is simple enough, because the executive and the majority in the House of Commons must always be in harmony, while the House of Lords can not resist anything on which they are seriously intent,—unless, perchance, it is convinced that the cabinet has lost the confidence of the public. Moreover, the American system furnished no machinery whereby a party could formulate its policy, select the candidates for high office, and insure that they should be the real leaders of the party and able to control its action; but in England the party policy is determined by the cabinet, and its members are the men who in the constant battles in the Commons have made themselves the leaders of their fellows. Our fathers would probably have felt a strong aversion for these objects had they been suggested, and certainly no attempt was made to attain them; and yet they are absolutely essential to a thorough government by party.

But while the framers of the Constitution did not provide an organization appropriate to party government, they established a system in which parties were a necessity. It was from the first inevitable, and soon became evident, that the real selection of the President would not be left to the judgment of the electoral college—a result which was made the more certain, first, by providing that the members should assemble by States, and hence should not meet together as a whole for deliberation; and second, by excluding from the college all Congressmen and holders of Federal offices—that is, all the leading men in national public life. Washington was designated by the universal sentiment of the nation, but such a piece of fortune could not occur again, and as the selection of his successors would certainly not be left to the individual discretion of the electors it behooved like-minded men who did not propose to throw their votes away to agree upon a candidate in advance, and this was equally true whether the choice of electors was made by the legislature of a State or directly by its people. As early as the year 1800, at the first election of Jefferson, the electoral college not only failed as a real organ for choosing the President, but as a piece of mechanism it proved so badly adapted to the party system that it had to be remodeled by the eleventh amendment of the Constitution. During the next score of years the need of some means of concentrating opinion in the selection of Presidential candidates was concealed by the succession of Virginians nominally recommended by the Congressional caucus but practically determined by the President himself.

With the ending of this period, which could under no circumstances have continued long, the want of some kind of machinery for selecting Presidential candidates became apparent. In a small country, where the voters were few and near enough together to confer with each other readily, the need would not have been acute, and an understanding might have been reached informally. But in a nation as large as the United States this was an impossibility, the more so because the habit of direct choice of the electors by the people had now become general, and at the same time the number of voters had been much increased by the extension of the franchise in the several States. It followed that unless the result of an election was to be a matter of chance, men who had similar objects in view must be brought to unite upon a candidate by some kind of party organization. After a few experiments in the recommendation of candidates by State legislatures the plan of national party conventions was evolved, and it has remained the regular method of selection.

National party organizations were thus a necessary consequence of the virtual election of the President by a popular vote throughout the nation. In some form they must exist in any country for the nomination of public officers who are chosen by a large electorate; and it may be observed that there has never existed any other single constituency in the world anywhere near so large as that which chooses the President of the United States. Moreover, this is not the only large electoral body in America. Each of the States, for example, is a single constituency for the choice of the governor by popular vote. It is, indeed, curious that democracy in Europe adheres to the custom of dividing the country for political purposes into comparatively small electorates, while in the United States it is the habit to make whole communities single constituencies for the choice of their chief officials, a state of things that involves the need of elaborate party machinery for nomination, and hence the creation of huge party organizations on a popular basis.

In the English system of parliamentary government, therefore, party works within the regular political institutions, not, indeed, within the legal institutions, because, as writers on the British constitution never weary of telling us, the cabinet and all the conventions of parliamentary government are quite unknown to the law, but within and as a part of the recognized institutions of government. The machinery of the parliamentary system developed out of the party life, and is simply the party machinery acting as an organ of the State. The cabal or group of party leaders, for example, has become the treasury bench. In fact, so far as Parliament is concerned, the machinery of party and of government are not merely consistent; they are one and the same thing.⁴

In America, on the other hand, the machinery of party has perforce been erected outside of the regular organs of government, and hence it is less effective and more irregular in its action. If in England a member of the majority in the House of Commons refuses to support an important measure upon which the cabinet insists, and if enough of his colleagues share his opinion to turn the scale, the consequence must be a change of ministry or a dissolution; but under similar circumstances in America no such dire results will follow. The measure will simply be lost, but the member can retain his seat undisturbed till the end of his term, and the administration will go on as before. Hence the difficulty in carrying out party platforms, and the discredit into which they have fallen in consequence. Moreover, a platform, however elaborate, can not include more than a small part of the matters that arise in Congress. The general public are interested in few things, and these alone find a place in the platform. For the rest, even the moral compulsion that attaches to a party declaration of faith is lacking, and hence it is exceedingly difficult to bring about party cohesion in such matters.

The system of committees in American legislative bodies tends also to remove measures from the field of party politics, for the committees to which bills are referred are always composed of members of both parties, and although it sometimes happens in Congress, in the case of a tariff bill, for example, that the majority and minority of a committee virtually meet separately, so that the bill when reported is really a party measure, this is an exceptional procedure even in Congress, and in many of the State legislatures it is entirely unknown. The work of the committees is usually in the nature of compromise; and if, as is often the case, the report of a committee is unanimous, or the divisions among the members do not run on party lines, it is obviously impossible to treat the bill when reported as a party measure. In Parliament, on the contrary, the great legislative committee is the cabinet, and every bill it introduces is of necessity a party measure so far as its own side of the House is concerned. If seriously opposed, the resistance is almost certain to come from the other side, so that the fight is likely to be conducted on party lines. With the present tendency to leave the initiative to the Government, this is getting to be true of almost all important questions. But the conditions in the United States effectually prevent such a result, and party issues can in the nature of things cover only a small part of legislation.

All this applies with still greater force to the States. The parties in America are essentially national parties. They exist primarily to elect the President, and only in a secondary degree to elect State officers. Hence they are divided mainly upon national issues, and it is difficult for them to take sides upon questions of State legislation without drawing lines that cut across the regular party lines, and offend a certain number of their adherents. Thus it happens that the members of most of the State legislatures are elected on party lines that have comparatively little connection with the questions they are called upon to decide. The same thing is true, and for the same reason, of the English borough councils, which are usually elected on party lines, but not usually divided upon them in their actual work; and it is noteworthy that in a provincial borough council the absence of party from the deliberations is referred to with pride. To say that there is politics in a council is a term of reproach, as it is in America, because it usually implies personal politics rather than a difference of opinion on public policy.

It has been argued that party exists in America in order to bring about an accord among public bodies that were made independent by the Constitution; to force into harmonious action the various representatives of the people;^a but it would seem more correct to say that party exists primarily to select those representatives. It does no doubt exert an important influence in helping the public bodies to cooperate, but it does not and can not exert the same direct pressure upon its members here that it can in England, and hence it is tempted to resort to other means of consolidating its authority and maintaining party cohesion. The most obvious means is patronage, in the form of appointments to public office, and that is one of the reasons why it is more difficult to get rid of the spoils system in America than in England.

This brings us to the problem already suggested, the attempt to explain the prevalent impression that party is more powerful and despotic in America than in England. But first we must repeat that the amount of irritation produced by partisan dictation depends, not upon the extent of that dictation, but upon the question whether it is felt to be justifiable or not. A very strenuous exertion of party pressure for a legitimate purpose will not cause as much complaint as a far smaller pressure for an object felt to be improper. Few sensible people object to a caucus of members of Congress to determine the attitude of a party upon the currency, but everyone resents the appointment of a grossly unfit postmaster because he happens to have a pull on an influential politician; and herein there is a great deal of popular confusion between the party and the machine, because people do not comprehend the relation that the machine bears to the party, or the class of matters with which it deals. The experience of the writer on the Boston school board at a time when an effort was made to get politics out of the schools may serve as an example. There was, unfortunately, a good deal of politics in the board, but this did not mean that the board was run on party lines, and it was not always easy to make people understand the distinction. As a matter of fact, there were very few, if any, strict party votes during the whole period. Moreover, the party machines were never opposed to each other, although they were sometimes quite ready to act together. Nor did they ever interfere with any question of public policy, but solely in personal matters relating to appointments to positions under the board. Now, this is a sample of what commonly happens, and is as commonly misunderstood. It is often stated that in the State legislatures the party boss, or the party caucus, dictates the action of the party on pending measures, and then carries it into effect by a party vote, so that legislation is really the work of the machine.^a

^a e. g. Henry Jones Ford's Rise and Growth of American Politics, a book full of penetrating suggestions. See also Professor Godnow's Politics and Administration, which develops the same idea from a different point of view.

That this is an error is proved by the statistics. If it were true, Pennsylvania, which possesses the most centralized kind of machine—a boss—ought to have in her legislature a long series of party votes, but in fact she has almost none. It is not true, because, in the first place, the machine rarely controls more than a part of the members of the party, and in the second place, the machine meddles very little with general legislation. It knows that to attempt to dictate to its followers on general legislation would only weaken its authority over them, and hence it confines its attention to the distribution of spoils, to laws that bear upon electoral machinery, and to such bills as affect directly the persons from whom it draws its revenue. It has, indeed, been pointed out that the very position of the boss depends upon the fact that parties exist for public objects, while he exists for private ones;^b and this is so well recognized that the great corporations which desire to obtain either improper legislation or protection against ^aProfessor Goodnow, in his Politics and Administration (p. 170), quotes with approval Mr. Horace E. Deming as saying: "The deliberative functions of the legislature as conceived by the 'fathers' have absolutely ceased to exist for many purposes. It registers automatically the will of a third party, and as little the results of its own deliberations as the electoral college. The form of a legislature survives, but the substance and the spirit have vanished. * * * The legislative power * * * is exercised by one man or a small, self-constituted group, through dummies who are still in name representatives of the people."

Another example, from quite a different source, may be found in a recent pamphlet advocating the referendum on behalf of working men, and entitled "Majority Rule." (Amer. Federationist, Vol. IX, No. 1½.) In it the author, Mr. George H. Shibley, says (p. 3): "From the foregoing it is clear that on all important bills the vote of each legislator is controlled, not by his own judgment, but by the decision of the party caucus, the control of which is in the machine that selects the nominees."

unscrupulous attack subscribe impartially to the campaign funds of both political parties. In short, as the ward heeler tersely expresses it, "There is no politics in politics." This is the aspect of public life that provokes an outcry from reformers. It is what Minghetti, writing of Italy, called the undue interference of parties in affairs that ought to lie outside their field. Parties in America are not, as a rule, despotic on public questions, because they have little cohesion; but their influence, or rather the influence of the machine, or of the individual politician, is freely exerted in things quite apart from those issues of public policy which form the only rational ground for party activity.

Every attentive observer must have remarked the much greater complaint of party politics in the government of our great cities than in the legislatures of most of the States. But that is not surprising when one considers how few questions of general public policy come before the city councils. Most questions of municipal policy are, in fact, carefully kept out of their control, and decided by the State legislature itself. On the other hand, the councils have had far greater opportunities than the legislatures for personal politics in the form of patronage and jobbery, and in these the machine has had a baneful sway. It is here that the field for legitimate party action has been least, and for improper influence has been greatest, and hence it is in the cities that indignation at party tyranny has been hottest.

A comparison of England and America shows that the influence of party upon legislation is on the whole much greater in England than in the United States, but that it is more closely confined to public measures. Each of these conditions has its evils, some upon the surface, others less obvious, though not less potent. But it is no part of the object of this paper to describe them, still less to attempt to weigh them in the balance or suggest remedies for them. The first effort of the student of government to-day must be to discover the facts, in the faith that any light thrown upon political conditions can not fail to help toward a wise solution of the problems they involve.

Out of 186 divisions printed above, the number of cases where 10 per cent or more split off were 79 Conservatives, 108 Reformers; of these last, Government whips were tellers in 44 and were not tellers in 64. Cases where 10 per cent did not split off: 107 Conservatives, 78 Reformers. It is not always easy in these earlier sessions to determine the cases where the tellers acted for the Government, but this would seem to have happened in 91 out of the 186 divisions.
Government tellers defeated once (No. 114). Majority of Reformers went against Government tellers 4 times (Nos. 78, 114, 119, 170). Reformers almost equally divided for and against Government tellers 5 other times (Nos. 34, 37, 38, 43, and 165).
